Is it possible to block GSM/GPS tracking device, without blocking mobile phones?
2020/08/15

Hello, Daniel! In ordinary circumstances, we'd suggest you to use universal GSM/GPS signal blocker, but as long as you need your mobile phone to work - that won't do. It will work if you have CDMA phone, so it will still work, while GSM and GPS frequencies are jammed. In that case, the tracker, installed in your car won't be able to send any information on your current location, speed, etc. Otherwise you'll have to use a simple GPS jamming device, which will block communications between satellites and the tracker. In that case the tracker won't be able to determine your location, but it will still have a connection with a dispatch and will notify him or her that satellite signal was lost. Also, you should consider cell tower triangulation. If that tracker has specific software - it will be able to determine your raw coordinates between three closest cell towers. Also, you should consider that those trackers may have additional modules, such as fuel indicator, built-in accelerometer and others, which do not need GPS signals to function properly. All the data collected with those modules is sent to a dispatch via GSM frequencies and will be visible to him or her no matter have you turned GPS jammer on or off. So, we at jammer-store.com suggest that the best way here is to block both GSM and GPS frequencies and switch to a CDMA cell phone, otherwise, data leaks may be critical. Thanks for your question, I hope, I've managed to help.
